Bryan Brulotte withdraws from the leadership race and advocates for Peter Mackay.

Since my announcement on December 16th, my leadership team and I have met and reached out to tens of thousands of Canadians. Together, we collaborated to formulate a compelling Vision for Canada, a document I am very proud of.

Although my desire to serve was and continues to be a motivating factor, after careful consideration and review of the recently published regulations, I have decided to withdraw from the leadership race for the Conservative Party. This is not a decision I made lightly. I believe in a united Canada and I still believe that vision can be achieved.

As such, it is with a strong sense of purpose that I fully encourage, and advocate for the upcoming leadership campaign of Peter MacKay. I have known Peter since 1997. He is a great Canadian, a trusted friend and a founder of the Conservative Party. Without a doubt, Peter has consistently displayed all the necessary attributes to become the Prime Minister of Canada. He is an individual of integrity, passion and charisma who possesses great skill as a natural and thoughtful leader.

My wife Kaitlin and I would like to thank everyone for their support during my campaign and although we will not be serving Canadians from a political perspective, we look forward to returning to our business careers. We will be resuming our philanthropic endeavours for mental health, the homeless, as well as, advocacy for the extended military community.
